Utility is the final production of Interrobang's
9th season: IDENTITY/CRISIS

Notes from Director, Georgette Verdin

RARE

UTILITY is a rare gem of a play. I know, because I read a lot of them. And, it isn't often such a play comes along: beautifully-minimal, female-centric and oozing with the type of truth that is, quite frankly, painful at times. Actress Michelle Williams described writer and film director Kelly Reichardt's work as "38 things buried under the semblance of nothing," and I feel the same is true of Schwend's script. You'll see there's not much to hide behind here—palpable histories, desires and disappointments bubbling just beneath the surface are what make this play exquisite.

RELEVANT

Having an ordinary woman at the center of a play sadly still feels like an act of rebellion. There is nothing extraordinary about Amber's life, which is precisely why it's worth celebrating.

From a more birdseye view perspective, it's important to remember that in large swaths of our country, whether it be small towns desimated by dying industries or inner cities, the concept of identity is frustratingly wrapped up in the fight for basic survival needs. If we really want to shift the needle and get our country headed in a direction that feels inclusive, we'll have to reach out to the marginalized in all corners, across all cultures, and employ radical empathy.

RAW

This piece feels very personal to me. Not least of all because I grew up in Louisiana in circumstances not unlike the ones presented. And most of all because Amber reminds me so much of my own mother at that time. Only looking back now as an adult can I recognize all that she was up against—the considerations she juggled, the sacrifices she made and the inner strength she possessed that allowed her to keep it all moving forward. I'm grateful to Emily for writing a reality that isn't often depicted on stage, or at least not with such tenderness and humanity. Maybe this play will make you feel seen as it has me. And, to my mom: I see you.
